Passage · Marianne Boruch

I took the old man in me & went to the river.
Get out, I said
opening my coat
to tree & air & ice.
Get out, I said. This is it.

He would not look at me.
Blunt feather
as he moved, light
winnowed him, dark trace spine & rib.
I thought: you sullen bird you fish. I imagined his blue eyes, hook simple, hard as dice. I swore above the glare: teach me now, bastard.
Thin pajamas, stepping into wind.

I buttoned my coat
as he walked toward the water.
For a moment, his hair flashed impossibly white. I thought of river filth his numb, pale weight dropping into the cold jaw.
I opened my mouth: nothing nothing
